American Tariff Controversies In The Nineteenth Century

Edward Stanwood

The plea for a protective tariff was one of the most controversial economic issues confronting the American public during the nineteenth century. The debate centered on whether the country should import goods at a higher cost to support domestic industries or allow free trade to ensure economic efficiency. This controversy was a significant political and economic issue that influenced the course of American economic policy and political discourse.