Irish Republican Women in America: Lecture Tours, 1916-1925 by Joanne Mooney Eichacker. Hello! On this page you can find information about the lectures given by five Irish republican women in the United States from 1916 to 1925. The women were Hanna Sheehy-Skeffington, Mary MacSwiney, Mrs. Muriel Douglas, Jenny Beale, and Joanne Mooney. They conducted lecture tours during this period, aiming to raise awareness about the Irish struggle for independence.

The lectures covered a range of topics, including the history of Irish Republicanism, the experiences of women in the struggle, and the role of women in political activism. The lectures were well-received and helped to strengthen the bond between Irish Republicanism and the wider American public.

The success of the lecture tours was due to the women's ability to connect with the American audience and to convey the importance of their cause. The lectures were not only informative but also entertaining, making them a popular choice among American audiences.

The women's lectures were not without controversy, however. Some American audiences were opposed to the ideas presented by the women, and there were instances of violence and harassment. Nonetheless, the lecture tours were a significant achievement for the women and helped to raise the profile of Irish Republicanism in America.

The lecture tours were also important in terms of their impact on the Irish Republican movement. The tours helped to raise funds and awareness for the cause, and they were a way of keeping the movement alive during a period of political turmoil.

Overall, the lecture tours were a significant achievement for the women and a testament to their dedication to the cause of Irish Republicanism. The success of the tours was due to the women's ability to connect with their audience and to convey the importance of their cause. The tours were a vital part of the Irish Republican movement and helped to strengthen the bond between Ireland and America.
